Navy 1-6: With reference to Mr. Kenneth Mason's direct testimony at Page 4, Lines 1-8, did the metering issues referenced there prevent the utility from metering the daily usage by its largest Commercial accounts, such as, for example, hotels and marinas, during the demand survey period?

Response: No. As detailed in the testimony of Harold Smith, the choice of commercial accounts was made by a formula presented to all interveners, which used a random selection of accounts after stratification by consumption. The initial 30 commercial accounts included only one top ten user in the Newport system, the Marriott Hotel. This account was used during the demand study.

Response to

The United States Department Of The Navy's Data Requests

Set 1

Navy 1-7: Were any of Newport's ten largest Commercial accounts omitted from the daily demand monitoring study? If Newport's response is affirmative, please state

- a. the monthly usages of any of the largest accounts omitted from the demand study from the beginning of Fiscal Year 2009 through the most recent month available;
- b. the ranking of each of the omitted accounts in terms of its annual usage within the Commercial class.

Response: As set forth in the response to Navy 1-6, only one of the top ten Commercial accounts was initially chosen and subsequently used by Newport Water for the demand study.

Response to

The United States Department Of The Navy's Data Requests

Set 1

Navy 1-8: Did the City of Newport experience a significant decline in tourism traffic during Fiscal Year 2009? If Newport's response is affirmative, does Newport have an estimate of the decrease in average day and maximum day demand for the Commercial class that resulted from the decrease in tourism traffic?

Response: The City does not have a department that specifically tracks tourism traffic. Therefore, we do not have any data to answer this question. There are private entities such as the Newport Chamber of Commerce and the Newport Convention & Visitor's Bureau that closely follow the trends in tourism in the City. Newport Water does not have an estimate of the effect any downturn in tourism has on average day and maximum day demands for the Commercial class.

Response to
The United States Department Of The Navy's Data Requests
Set 1

Navy 1-9: With reference to Page 10, Lines 16 – 19 of Mr. Smith's direct testimony, does Newport have an explanation or analysis for the finding that its Residential class has a relatively low peaking factor when compared to the residential classes of many other water utilities?

Response: An explanation for the relatively low peaking factor exhibited by Newport's Residential class would be purely speculative, but it is possible that Newport's Residential class irrigates less than residential customers served by other utilities.

As for analysis, the analysis of billing system data and the data gathered during the daily sampling period in the summer of 2009 indicated that Newport's Residential class has a Max Day peaking factor that is lower than the residential class of many other utilities. The analysis of billing system data is included in the rate model that was provided with the rate filing. The analysis that uses daily sampling data is included as Attachments A and B to this response.

Attachment A provides a summary of the daily data for each sample account by month and for the entire sample period. The last row of data for each class is a summary of the data for each class by month and for the sample period. The results of this analysis were not considered for use in the cost of service analysis because peaking factors based only on data during the typical peak demand period will not be indicative of demand characteristics for the entire year.

Attachment B is an analysis that compares the daily sample period Max Day for each class to the FY 09 average day consumption for each class based on FY09 consumption data for the daily sample accounts. The results of this analysis are shown on RFC Schedule D-8.

Response to

The United States Department Of The Navy's Data Requests

Set 1

Navy 1-13: Please show how water usage data from the demand study was used to calculate the Navy's peak day and peak hour demand ratios.

Response: Data collected during the daily read study was only used to develop usage adjustment factors that were in turn used to develop Max Day ratios as shown on RFC Schedule B-8. The usage adjustment factors were developed by compiling day of the week consumption data for each class during the daily sampling period and comparing consumption for the day of the week on which maximum consumption occurred and the average day of the week during the daily sample period. The table below shows this analysis for the Navy meters.
